For some time our champion checkorist and grocer, C. L. White, had fancied that the bottom of his well at home had underground connection with Herring's or the White Drug Co., soda fountain which, among other approved drinks, dispenses root beer. Not desiring to dilute his drinking water, he had the ube taken up last Wednesday, and discovered that a sure enough root had gotten started in at the top, grown downward to the very bottom, filling the ube completely and moulding its root into the appearance of a gigantic lengthy hologna sausage. Had it not been disturbed it is probable that the freak would have continued downward to an unknown distance, as it was healthy and still growing. The opinion was advanced by some local scientists that it was a part of the root of the bi-cuplet of some pre-historic mammoth, but Charlie says he bored the well since all such animals died.

Tuesday was decoration day, and many of our women and girls out in the day beautifying the cemetery with a profusion of flowers. There was not the interest manifested that should have been, but the indifference on the occasion is not so marked as is the general neglect of our city of the dead. We feel duty ashamed of our selves when we think of it. Somebody please take the lead with a mowing machine, we will follow with a rake or fork. The last rainfall is sufficient to wet the tall grass and weeds in the various avenues through the place to an extent most disagreeable when we have to go there. The unhealthiness is bad enough, but combined with the discomfort when having to pull thru knee high grass and tangled weeds, is next to unendurable. Many of our citizens keep their lawns looking so, and surrounded by them so sadly neglected, they can hardly for us to dream their neighbors differently.
